If re-elected, we will take action to confront addiction through community-centered, evidence-based strategies. Our focus will be on expanding mental health and substance use treatment options, investing in prevention education, and making recovery resources more accessible and equitable across all communities. One standout initiative—the Recovery Diversion Program, which began in Long Branch and has grown to serve other towns in Monmouth County—demonstrates the power of early intervention and supportive care. Its success makes a strong case for scaling the program statewide. We believe addiction must be addressed as a public health challenge and we are dedicated to replacing stigma with support, and punishment with compassion.
